

How interesting it is that so many involved in the "full-court press" in the media to gin up opposition to the anticipated relaxation of restrictions on media ownership, (citing the need for diverse opinion), were so in favor of campaign finance laws that would prohibit diverse opinion within 60 days of an election. And where was the concern when AOL merged with Time-Warner, or when Disney gobbled up ABC? And where was the diverse opinion--a FCC commissioner besides Adelstein--on Nightline the other night? There are plenty of venues where diverse and local opinion and news can be found. Even ClearChannel must turn a profit (unlike PBS); if people don't like the right or left slant or bias to what is offered, they will turn the dial, and media owners will adjust their content accordingly. Let free enterprise, and choice, work.
